Suggestive guidance how to identify fake e-mail job offers/interview call:

- The e-mails come from a free, public domain email account (such as gmail.com or hotmail.com or directappointhrd.com etc.) and not a company e-mail id such as adityabirla.com.
- They would request a cash deposit in a bank account or payment in some form.
- They may ask for personal details such as bank account, credit card number, personal address, social security/PAN number. Sometimes to make the offer seem authentic, the e-mail will call for submission of 'qualification documents', 'experience certificate', photographs, etc.
- If the e-mail begins with "Dear Sir", "Dear User" or "Dear Applicant" the sender of the e-mail does not know you by name. A legitimate source will address you with a proper salutation, which contains your last name. It will also not be sent as a mass mail.
- Another way to identify fake job offers/interview call is when you spot several grammatical errors in the e-mail text. This would not usually happen in an e-mail from a legitimate company.
- The interview details will have a proper venue with clear address and exact time given and not a general e-mail.
